

DOMINIC COPPENS advises governments and private actors on international trade rules, in particular on the rules of the World Trade Organization (WTO). He assists WTO Members in trade disputes concerning trade in goods (with a particular focus on subsidy rules), trade in services, and intellectual property rights. Dominic has advised WTO Members at each stage of WTO dispute settlement proceedings, covering consultations, panel, appeal, compliance, and arbitration proceedings.

Most recently, Dominic has been working on the intersection between trade and environment, including on circular economy initiatives and on trade aspects of the European Union Green Deal.

Dominic writes and presents on the most technical and complex issues of WTO law. He is the author of the leading treatise on WTO subsidy law, “WTO Disciplines on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures: Balancing Policy Space and Legal Constraints” (Cambridge University Press, 2014). The book has been described as “a masterful analysis of subsidy laws,” and as a “goldmine of analysis that will be useful to scholars and practitioners alike – for a long time” (Lucas Rubini, World Trade Review, October 2015), and as a “remarkable book ... of rare clarity and precision,” presenting “a unique accomplishment” as it is “the first very comprehensive discussion of the Subsidies and Countervailing Measures (SCM) Agreement from a law and economics perspective” (Petros Mavroidis, foreword to the book).

In addition, Dominic lectures regularly on International Economic Law at Leuven University and Ghent University. He speaks at international conferences and publishes on various aspects of international trade law in peer-reviewed journals and books. Dominic also serves as reviewer of World Trade Review.

Dominic previously served as Legal Officer at the WTO’s Legal Affairs Division and was a post-doctoral fellow at Leuven University.
